Spread the loveChildren begin their education by learning how to read. As they get older, they read to learn. By the time they are in the sixth grade, the average child has a receptive vocabulary of 50,000 words. They've read millions of words in fiction, online, and in textbooks. Because literacy is essential for success in any subject, students need additional literacy instruction and ...

Spread the loveEvery educator is familiar with the concept of literacy—the ability to read and write. A person who is illiterate, who cannot read or write, will inevitably struggle to get along in society. It's impossible to go on to higher education or get a high-paying job without the ability to read and write. Even daily tasks, like reading a newspaper or filling out job applications ...
