Her father, Wald, was immortalized in Barnes's first novel, 1928's Ryder, as a reckless and hated failure of a man with two wives and two sets of children living under one roof. A heavily autobiographical work, Ryder is extremely experimental: multiple points of view, multiple protagonists, more styles than any reader can keep up with.

Nightwood, Djuna Barnes' 1936 novel, has quite the reputation; it's both a modernist and a lesbian classic, it's notoriously difficult, and it comes with a commendation from Mr T.S. Eliot himself. While I can confirm that the novel does take some persistence, and that it is indeed modern, and that the foreword speaks for itself, I can't quite wrap my head around why it is that ...
